

Debra Stein is president of GCA Strategies and the author of several books on NIMBYism. Her expertise in building community support for controversial land use projects is balanced by her success in translating public attitudes into political action. Debra is the author of ground-breaking books on entitlements such as Winning Community Support for Land Use Projects and Making Community Meetings Work, as well as numerous articles on hostile audience management, building public acceptance for master planned communities, housing for the homeless and special populations, and Smart Growth and infill development. Debra provides overall outreach and advocacy strategy and communications training for GCA clients.

Debra is a member of the International Association of Participation Professionals, the Association for Conflict Resolution, the Urban Land Institute, and the California Bar Association. She has a B.A. in Political Management from the University of California at Berkeley and a law degree from the University of San Francisco.
